Congratulations!

You have completed all parts of this research guide.

Give yourself a pat on the back.

But this does not mean we are finished.

Mosquitoes are still a major problem for many people in large parts of the world.

Your research has really just started.

Think about this:

- Are there any questions that are still not answered about mosquitoes?
- Is there anything else we still need to learn to help more people protect themselves from these diseases?

There is always something new to learn to help others.

This new understanding will continue to change the decisions we make.

We must think about how we can continue to make things better for the world.

Hopefully, the issue is clearer to you now.

How can you help it become clearer to other people around you?

How can you help someone in a different community learn more about this problem?

Just remember, every community is different.

The same answer is not always right for every place in the world.

But the question remains the same:

How can we ensure health for all from mosquito-borne diseases?

Be creative.

Ask questions.

Make a plan.

Explore the world around you.

Be open-minded.

And most important, think about how we can work together to make the world a better place.
